Excerpt: . . . care of promptly where such attention will prevent an accident with consequent damage to track, or will ward off the need for some extensive repair work in the near future. Among the men now available for foremen there is apt to be a tendency to fail to appreciate the need for attention to small defects. There is also apt to be, on account of not making or carrying out a proper program of work, a failure to get the most good out of the insufficient help available. The increased amount of assistance and instruction which the foremen need from their superiors makes it advisable in many cases to reduce the roadmasters or supervisors territory. In addition to the benefits to be obtained from the immediate increase in supervisory force, the increase in the number of roadmasters positions will provide more prospects for promotion for ambitious foremen. Fortunately, roadmasters, supervisors and their assistants can be appointed solely on considerations of fitness without compulsory application of any seniority rules. The roadmaster should be relieved in so far as is possible from clerical work. At handling track work he can give satisfactory return for the wages paid him. As a rule, he has not been trained to handle clerical work and such work when done by him is apt to be of indifferent quality and very expensive, considering the wages paid him for the time spent doing it. When there is any considerable amount of construction work...
