Fair too Jjhe little village, where my wandering footsteps And picturesqu the rustic inn, beneath the old elm s shade; The dancing stream which rippled on, beside the garden wall, The apples glowing neath the sun, the flickering aspens taU. How sweet my evening meal!--fresh trout, caught in clear mountain stream, Some new laid eggs, and saffron cakes, with golden clotted cream; And luscious honey, redolent of fragrant heather flowers, And ripe fruit, culled by childish hands, from mossy woodland bowers; And sparkling cider, banquet e en an epicure might prize, A sight more welcome could not cheer a weary traveller s eyes. Then, rested and refreshed, I rose and wandered forth once more, And passjng through the village street, paused at the churchyard door; And finding it unlatched, I stepped within the old oak gate, Thinking inside the ivied porch one tranquil hour to wait. The sun was sinking in the west, and streaks of roseate hue, Across an avenue of limes their pencilled radiance threw; Lower and lower sank the sun, and with intense delight I watched it setting in a flood of colour fiery bright, Watched, with that feeling rapt of awe, which e en the careless feel, When, in some...
