Not illustrated. 1872 Excerpt: . . . the national song with accompaniment of stringed instruments and sweet bucolic pipes, until they filled all the grassy slopes of the grove. There, on a pedestal of bronze, stood the image of the queen they had revered, her face upturned in the rapture of poetry and song, her cithara upon her arm, and her beautiful fingers hovering over the strings. Then silence was proclaimed, and the king's household arose, and his daughter Chrysostoma, the princess apparent, who inherited her father's noble character and her grandmother's transcendent genius, apostrophized the form of beauty in strains that were long after remembered. Then, turning to the people, she led the way by imperceptible modulations until she brought all hearts to the beginning of their favorite hymn, and as she struck the well-known chords for prelude, countless voices joined in chorus. As she stood all radiant in her maidenly beauty,...
