Excerpt: . . . the dust has settled we are sure both sides will be bound to recognize that it was indifference defeated the League. Not a selfish indifference, a deliberate determination to live on in our highly profitable isolation, but the indifference which derives from unsureness. It is not that the nation disapproved this new internationalism and decisively rejected it--even those of us who have counted most on American opinion to avert the danger can hardly claim this. America voted no on the new internationalism because she has just discovered she has not yet any certain knowledge of nationalism. It is not through any official blundering or diplomatic shortcomings of her own that America has come to realize how unlettered she is in the science of political systems. In the past five years we have been forced to watch Europe, England particularly, and compare her ways with...
